Hidden price of inheritance: Survey says 58% of families paid bribes to transfer assets

New Delhi. (Agency)

When a family member dies, especially the bread winner, the grief is often followed by a long list of practical tasks, such as transferring a house, bank deposits, shares, mutual funds, jewellery and other assets to the rightful heirs. But for many families, completing that process can come with another, less expected cost: bribes.A survey by LocalCirces found that 58% of families who transferred the assets of a deceased family member said they had to pay bribes to complete the process. The problem was not limited to a single point of contact either. While 29% said they had to pay bribes in one or two places, another 29% said they had to pay in "lots of places".The findings come even as governments and regulators have been pushing digitisation of property, financial and other records in an effort to make such processes easier and more transparent.ONLY 32% FOUND THE TRANSFER PROCESS EASY

The LocalCircles survey received more than 32,000 responses from citizens across 349 districts. Of the 11,319 respondents who answered the question on the experience of transferring assets after a family member's death, only 32% said the process was easy.The remaining families reported difficulties at different stages.

About 11% said the process was straightforward because there was a registered will. Another 21% said they did not have a registered will but were still able to complete the transfer process.However, 16% said that despite having a registered will, they had not been able to complete the transfer. Another 21% had no registered will and found the process very difficult, while 16% did not have a registered will and had not been able to complete the processA further 10% said they had not yet initiated the transfer process but needed to do so.

This suggests that having a will, while potentially making succession clearer, does not necessarily make the administrative process of transferring assets straightforward.

BRIBES HAVE ACTUALLY RISEN SINCE 2022

One of the most striking findings is that the incidence of reported bribery has increased rather than declined over the past four years..
